UP-BRINGING OF BOYS.

Playing With Dolls Said to Cultivate Paternal Instinct.

"Never laugh at a boy because he is fond of dolls, and never tease a man because he helps his wife take care of the baby," said Dr. Mary Wood-Allen, addressing the New York City Mothers' Club at the Waldorf-Astoria yesterday afternoon.

"Because the paternal instinct is less strong than the maternal, it should be the more carefully cultivated. A man gains much by assisting in the care of his children, and it is really more important that a boy should play with dolls than that a girl should do so."

"Many men are indifferent and unsympathetic to their children, simply because their paternal instinct was never cultivated. When they were children themselves their parents gave them whips and drums and guns, and told them that dolls were only for girls."

"I know a man who has five fine bulldogs which are objects of great solicitude to him. Their food and exercise are all carefully regulated under his personal supervision. But his little daughter's mouth is full of decayed teeth, and he is not at all concerned about it. That man's paternal instinct had never been developed."

"Little boys are often very fond of less strong than the maternal. It has a grandson, fourteen months old, who always takes his rag doll to bed with him and sleeps with its feet tucked tenderly under his chin."

Dr. Wood-Allen also said that children could be taught when very young to look forward to parenthood and to regulate their conduct with a view to its effect upon their future children.

"They sometimes apply such instruction in unexpected ways," she remarked. "After listening to one of my lectures on heredity a little girl was heard to say to another: 'If you want your children to mind you've got to mind mamma.' My own little daughter, when I reminded her at the age of seven of the possible influence of the naughtiness on her children, asked, 'What kind of a little girl were you?' I replied: 'No one told me when I was a child that what I was would influence my children. If any one had done so I might have made it easier for you.'—New York Tribune.
